This painting stood out to me when I visited MoMa. I was drawn to the colors, the paint strokes, how peaceful the painting was, also because I love landscape paintings. Most of the other photos I saw at the exhibit had a very strong meaning behind it, usually signifying discrimination, injustice, and violence. I later found out that these series of paintings were a war tribute for everyone that passed away in World War I. This information shocked me because the amount of peace that this canvas showed and the fact that the whole goal but to even be able to paint something and have that type of effect on people is amazing and not even this art work but all of them. Also the fact that he put so much time into not only his paintings but also his garden which were what his artworks were based on and how dedicated he was even when he was affected by not only the war but by loved ones passing away he was able to paint such beautiful and peaceful artworks.
